MUSCLE BOUND

It was the first really warm day of Spring, and all day the students at Fairleigh High School had spent long minutes gazing out the sun-flooded windows, and then turning sharply back toward the teachers when they heard their sharp commands for attention. Fairleigh teachers, as well as all teachers everywhere, were never surprised by the pangs of Spring Fever that usually hit their students about that particular time of year when winter coats are more often seen carried over a student's arm, rather than on his back, and they tried hard to bear with it. Now that the school day was finally over, two teachers stood silently by, smiling broadly, as a mass of students rushed through the hall to the front door, eager to get out into the lovely weather.

Two girls, however, didn't rush from the building. Instead, they walked idly out, letting themselves be pushed by the over-eager students, calmly picking up dropped books and pocketbooks and pencils that were brushed from their arms by the others. Finally, they walked outside, down the crowded steps, across the sunny, green campus, and sauntered casually into Oakdale Street, where they both lived, next door to one another.

Judy Grove stopped in front of her own home, and said, "It's a great day for not doing homework, Ginny. How about doing some porch-sitting with milk and cookies?"

Ginny was up in a cloud somewhere, but managed to come down long enough to say, "Milk and cookies? Sure. Gosh, soon it'll be iced tea and chocolate sundaes. And moonlight rides on Moon Lake. And beach parties at the shore. Wiener roasts. Ah, summer . . ."

"Whoa!" Judy laughed, restraining her friend. "It's not even May, and you're way ahead in August somewhere. Slow down. Wait, I'll bring out the milk and cookies."

In a few moments she was out again, milk and cookies on a tray, and a huge grin on her shiny face. The two friends drank their milk and nibbled idly at chocolate chip cookies.

After a minute Judy asked, "Well, are you back to the present yet, Ginny? I wouldn't be surprised to see you call for me tomorrow morning dressed in a bathing suit, your books in a beach bag."

"Oh, don't be silly, Judy. It's just that last summer was so wonderful, I'm just anxious to have another one just like it. Remember all the fun we had with the boys, going down to the beach, lazying around from day to day, dancing at night either on the beach or at the Community Council dances. The colored lanterns they strung up on the Council House porch were breathtaking!"

"And I also remember," Judy said, "How Chuck and Mark, Billy and all the other guys complained that the summer was TOO lazy . . . that most of them should have been exercising their muscles all summer in athletic activities rather than lounging around gaining all that weight."

A deep voice suddenly shattered their fond remembrances of the summer past. "Which reminds me, this summer I'll be doing a little weight-lifting instead of weight-gaining!" It was Chuck, who was almost going steady with Judy. They had been neighbors for years, and just naturally did things together, and were always expected to turn out at occasions together. That's the way it would probably be this summer, too, unless unforeseen things happened. Judy instinctively gave her tousled hair a pat, and smiled at Chuck.

"Don't be silly! There'll be too many wiener roasts and dances for you to bother with that silly old weight-lifting, Mr. Atlas. If you want to keep your youthful figure, I'll teach you some new dance steps!" Judy laughed, producing another glass of milk and more cookies.

"And if you want to keep your youthful figure," Ginny warned her best friend, "you'd better put down that cookie. It's your 6th!"

Spring came and soon left again, and many an afternoon was spent on Judy's front porch, with the whole gang of boys and girls discussing the summer that was now upon them.

One afternoon, when school had been closed for only a few days, Ginny joined the crowd on the front porch. The kids were discussing some coming events.

"Well, the first Council dance is Saturday night," Millie Frank was saying, batting her eyelashes at Bill Haver, hoping he would get the subtle hint. Ginny sat beside Mark, and hoped he would take the hint without her having to bat her lashes.

Instead, Mark said, "Heck, girls, I thought you knew we guys decided dances and parties were taboo for us, for most of the summer. We're going over to the gym this Saturday night, and every Saturday night all summer, and we're going to do calisthenics, weight lifting and stuff like that. Do you want us to be too fat to play on the team next semester?"

The girls looked at one another. They saw that the boys weren't fooling. Millie was about to protest, when she saw Judy put her finger to her lips, and Millie remained silent, convinced that Judy had a better idea.

The girls had never been so anxious before to have the boys leave, but when finally Chuck popped his seventh chocolate chip cookie into his mouth and sauntered off the front porch toward his own house, the girls chorused a sigh of relief.

"Obviously, Judy," Ginny smiled, "you have an idea . . . Shoot!"

"Well, we can see where it'll be a tough job convincing the boys that Saturday nights this summer would be better spent with us at the Council dances and such. Why don't we just spend our Saturday nights with them, doing all the calisthenics and running and stuff just like they do?"

"Hmph!" Ginny snorted, picturing herself in those ridiculous gym outfits that were the uniform of the town gym. "One glance at what we gals look like in that gym get-up and they'll run for the Council dances . . . HEY!"

"Right," Judy laughed at her friend's startled look, "and we start this very weekend!"

On Saturday night, Chuck and the others stood open-mouthed at the entrance to the gym as a group of ridiculously clad girls strode past them. Judy's gym suit was obviously two sizes too large for her, and he had to pinch himself to keep from laughing just hard enough to insult her.

Before the calisthenics class was ready to begin, he stopped to talk with the girls. Mark and Bill joined the group, trying hard not to laugh.

"And just what do you gals think you're doing here?" Chuck asked. "Trying to give us guys some competition?"

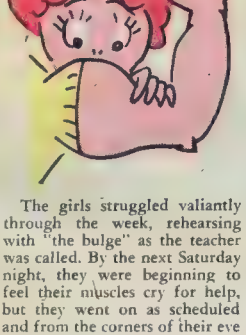
"Why, no," said Judy slyly, "we're just trying to show you that we're interested in the same things you boys are. Why, dances and boat rides would absolutely bore us, when we knew you'd all be over here having a perfectly wonderful time doing all sorts of exciting things."

Millie groaned silently, seeing the enthusiastic-looking calisthenics instructor strut into the room, ready to begin.

After the session was over, Judy smiled at Chuck, and went to the shower rooms with the other girls, smiling back over her shoulder until Chuck could no longer see her. Then she groaned, and rubbed her aching shoulders and neck where they hurt, and groaned again just thinking about how much more they would hurt the next morning.

But the smiles were back when the girls met the boys outside of the big building a half-hour later. They waited, smiles fading, however, for a word from one of the boys that they wouldn't think of having the girls looking like they did in gym suits when Council dance attire was so very much more becoming. But no such words came.

By ten the next morning, the phones were ringing busily. Judy talked to Ginny, saying, "Did you happen to notice that announcement on the bulletin board in the gym as we left? Well, it said that Miss Bulge, our own high school gym class teacher, was going to lead the girl's annual calisthentics exhibition. You know how crazy she can get. How about it? That really ought to clinch it for the boys!"



The girls struggled valiantly through the week, rehearsing with "the bulge" as the teacher was called. By the next Saturday night, they were beginning to feel their muscles cry for help, but they went on as scheduled and from the corners of their eye sought the audience for the boys.

Miss Bulge was very thorough. With each stretching of her arms, she seemed to be egging the girls on, almost daring them to outdo her. Judy squirmed and groaned, and could hear Ginny, stationed behind her, echoing her sentiments exactly.

It was over in an hour, an hour Judy thought she would never live through. Somehow she managed to make her way, arms wrapped around Ginny, to the showers, and got dressed. The girls were met outside by the boys, who were no longer grinning.

"Uh, you . . . er . . . were great, kids. Someday soon, you'll . . . er . . . be ready for the weights. Great exhibition." The boys tried hard to sound impressed at the girls' efforts.

But apparently, Chuck could stand the farce no longer, and blurted out, "Gosh, Judy, we appreciate your wanting to do what pleases us, but we don't want a bunch of muscley girls to carry OUR books next semester. How about chucking this whole idea? So help me, girls weren't cut out for giving gym exhibitions. Do you think you'd have time to get home and change? We can still make the last few dances at the Council house!"

Suddenly, from somewhere, strength came to Judy, as well as to her other friends. She and Ginny dressed together, helping with zippers and hooks, and coming down the steps looking very much unlike the girls in Miss Bulge's gym exhibition.

And as they walked home again after the dance, Ginny and Judy found that their feet didn't even hurt a bit. They even had the courage to mention an event scheduled for the next weekend.

Judy said, somewhat hesitantly, "Chuck, do you think you boys could forget about the gym next weekend? There's a moonlight boatride on Moon Lake."

Ginny added, "But, if you'd prefer not to, well, just say the word and we'll join you down at the gym."

Mark and Chuck stopped dead in their tracks. "No, thanks," Chuck laughed, "don't do that. From now on, all our athletic exercise will consist of using our feet for dancing and our arms for rowing boats on Moon Lake."

By the time Judy fell into her bed, she could hardly move a muscle. But she managed a sleepy smile as her head hit the pillow. It had been hard work. As she fell asleep, she dreamed of a huge dance hall, hundreds of teen agers dancing, and a very lonesome, but nevertheless enthusiastic Miss Bulge doing her calisthenics, unnoticed, in the middle of the dance floor.
